

Caution is good—tho' Headstrong still Would rather follow his own will,

Master Headstrong. 63

He could plainly observe a way to it, which led through a long road, far off to the right; but as he found it must take a great deal of time to follow this, he resolved to take a little crooked path, that he doubted not would presently bring him to the top of the hill. He proposed to enter on it immediately, but he soon found the difficulties that attended his undertaking were much greater than he had at first imagined they would be: many a
